MAN AND MAID

Polly jerked her head up in an embarrassed little fashion, to find the eyes of a perfect stranger fixed inquiringly—and with undisguised admiration—upon her flushing cheeks.

He lifted his hat courteously as he said, "I beg your pardon, but could you direct me to Col. Whittaker's?" "Certainly. I am from there myself. I—" she hesitated, making frantic efforts to wrench loose her refractory skirts. "I—you see—I am—Polly."

"The—one of the maids," he said, nodding comprehensively, as his eyes fell to the daintily-trimmed apron pinned about her waist.

"Um—hum. And, by the way, if you—that is—I wish—"

The stranger glanced toward her abruptly, and, divining in full the urgency of her predicament, rode his mare to the other side of the stream.

"I'll ride up the bank," he explained, "and as soon as—as you have collected your—er—huckleberries I shall be no end grateful if you'll assist me in locating the place."

Resuming the conversation a moment later, he observed, "Why, you see, I am a little in advance of the party. I am—"

"Ah! A man—a valet, of course," put in the maid quickly. "I might have known at once."

The stranger nodded and smiled at the pertinacity of the girl. "Yes," he assented, "you may not know, but my master is very particular about the conventions. I came on ahead to have things ready for him."

Polly's pretty lips cramped with amusement.

"Which is your master?" she asked, demurely. For the valet was very good, indeed, to look upon—for a maid.

"Capt. Barrington," "Indeed!" The maid blushed crimson. "Then he will be more than welcome here, I know. I've often heard my—master speak of him."

"They were great friends down in Clefuegos. The colonel once saved my—my master's life. They are more like father and son than just friends."

The maid was silent for a moment. Presently she said: "Your name is—Hawkins, isn't it?"

"How did you guess?" "I didn't. You see, Col. Whittaker talks a lot about the captain, so, of course—"

"His 'trusty' was sometimes brought in. I understand. By the way, Polly, I wonder how Miss Whittaker will like him?"

"Capt. Barrington?"

"Yes. Now, if I tell you a little secret, you'll never let on to the young lady?" He studied her quizzically, with a half-concealed twinkle in his deep gray eyes.

"Cross my heart," cried Polly, slipshodly, but with the blood springing to her cheeks.

"Once, when the colonel was down east," resumed Hawkins, in a grave tone, "he and my master were talking secrets. I heard the old man say, 'Dick, I'd give the half of my life to see you and my girl—'"

"Humph!" the maid cut in, with a toss of her curls.

"Do you think Miss Whittaker cares for—anyone else?" he asked apprehensively.

"I know she does," was the swift retort.

"A twig crackled sharply. Polly started up with a little guilty flush. "I really must be going, Hawkins. Here comes my—my master now. He will direct you."

It was one week later.

Miss Whittaker drew back with a little gasp of indignation. "Capt. Barrington!" She rubbed her cheek vigorously with the back of her hand.

"But—but, dearest," he began, "Miss Whittaker—" "It isn't a bit of use," she broke in, turning her back, "not a particle. I can never forgive you—never!"

Richard Barrington remained silent for some time.

"Good-bye." His hand crushed hers till she winced. "After all," he said, "I ought to have known—I ought to have remembered."

"Remembered—what?" She began to shake all over. Her forced bravado was slipping away with every breath.

"What the maid told—Hawkins—that day—down by the brook."

"Oh, but you forget. How should I understand—be responsible—"

"He asked her," he said gravely, "if she thought Miss Whittaker cared for anyone in particular, and—"

"Yes?" The girl leaned forward more eagerly than she knew, and the breath came unevenly through her parted lips.

"She said," he went on stonily, "know she does."

"Oh," said the girl, "but she—she was only the maid."

"But she spoke the truth?" he demanded, catching her little cold hands in a savage grasp.

Her head sank forward, and her lids fell. "I—I can not deny it," she said. "Miss Whittaker," began Barrington, in a sudden change of tone, "since it seems to be all settled that I am to go away forever, you don't mind telling me who he is, the lucky fellow, my rival?"

The girl turned and looked at him steadily; her cheeks were like scarlet flowers, and her lips twittered. A little rippling laugh broke musically in her throat. "Stupid!" she said, "can't you guess? Don't you—don't you know? It was—it was—only Hawkins."

A Vast Sum.

The amount of money which the government is called upon to redeem in the course of the year reaches an almost fabulous amount. In 1904, for instance, it totaled $912,000,000. This redemption is either for the purpose of securing clean, fresh notes or to get change of some other denomination.

Strong French Porters.

The porters of the central markets at Paris, which are the largest markets in the world, are called "the strong men of the markets" because of their great muscle and endurance. They wear hats as big as parasols, which enable them to carry on their heads most unwieldy and unpleasant burdens, such as crates of fowls, rabbits and wild pigs.
